BRETT KAVANAUGH VS. THE EXONERATED CENTRAL PARK FIVE: EXPOSING THE PRESIDENT'S "PRESUMPTION OF INNOCENCE" DOUBLE STANDARD

Sofia Yakren*

In the service of Justice Brett Kavanaugh's confirmation to the United States Supreme Court, the President of the United States (and Republican Senators) both misappropriated and further eroded the already compromised concepts of due process and presumption of innocence. This Essay uses the prominent "Central Park Five" case in which five teenagers of color were wrongly convicted of a white woman's widely-publicized beating and rape to expose the President's disparate use of the presumption along race and status lines. This narrative is consistent with larger systemic inequities that leave poor black and brown criminal defendants less likely to benefit from the presumption of innocence than their white counterparts.

I. ORIGINS AND MEANING OF "PRESUMPTION OF INNOCENCE"

The principle "innocent until proven guilty" encompasses two historic protections for individuals accused of crimes: first, placing the burden of proving guilt on the accuser, and, second, prohibiting punishment until conviction.1 The Babylonian Code of Hammurabi (1792-1750 B.C.), one of the oldest written codes of law, required anyone making a criminal accusation to prove guilt and emphasized the import of this procedural safeguard by imposing a death sentence on certain false accusers. Similarly, early Roman law deemed it a serious offense to risk “the reputation, the fortunes and finally the status and the life of another” without compelling proof. In 352 B.C., the Greek orator Demosthenes argued that one could not be labeled a criminal or be punished until convicted after a proper trial, at which point “conscience permits us to inflict punishment according to knowledge . . . .”

In the early common law days, English monarchs often used imprisonment arbitrarily. However, the Magna Carta, a charter of rights to which King John of England agreed in 1215, guaranteed “the king’s subject[s] immunity from imprisonment, or other punishment, save through the due process of the law.” The common law adopted the presumption of innocence in subsequent centuries and colonists brought the principle with them to America. Accordingly, in the United States, bail was presumed for all noncapital offenses and “a legal determination at trial” became a prerequisite for punishing a defendant for a crime.

Despite the ancient origins of the presumption of innocence and the incomparably high stakes of the criminal process, United States laws have chipped away at the presumption over time by restricting the rights of pretrial detainees. For instance, in 1979, the United States Supreme Court upheld as constitutional several challenged pretrial confinement conditions, reasoning that the “presumption of innocence is a doctrine that allocates the burden of proof in criminal trials . . . [and] has no application to a determination of the rights of a pretrial detainee during confinement before his trial has even begun.”

drastic blow to the presumption of innocence” with its disregard of the presumption’s historic pretrial liberty requirement,11 the Court did not preclude the principle’s application before trial, outside the confinement context.12

Selective use of the presumption of innocence along race and class lines has further degraded the principle. “People of color in the United States, particularly young black men, are often assumed to be guilty and dangerous.”13 Even “innocent children [] are being victimized by a presumption of guilt that never sees black and brown youth as blameless . . . .”14 Creating an insidious pipeline from school to prison, “[t]he presumption of guilt follows too many poor and minority children to school.”15 As a result of these systemic oppressions, one out of three black boys born in 2001 is likely to serve time in jail or prison during his lifetime.16 The rate of incarceration per capita is 6.4 times higher for black men and 2.6 times higher for Latino men than for white men.17 Further, research shows that prosecutors are more likely to seek the death penalty against black and Latino defendants accused of victimizing a white person, and jurors are more likely to issue the death penalty in such cases.18

Most typically, the presumption of innocence is a protection associated with the criminal rather than civil law arena. After all, “[w]ith reputation, liberty, and at times even life on the line, every legal and moral precept counsels caution in bringing down the hammer of justice on a criminal defendant.”19 To the extent that Judge J. Harvey Wilkinson III has argued for a presumption of innocence in the civil context, he has limited the concept’s relevance to “civil defendants [who] are frequently subject to immense, unrecoverable costs prior to any real forecast or determination of liability” in “a system in which civil plaintiffs enjoy tremendous procedural advantages at almost every stage of litigation . . . .”20 Even assuming the presumption of innocence could or should apply to the protection of civil defendants, using the concept loosely in connection with accusations outside a litigation context would distort its origins and purposes irredeemably.

II. PRESUMPTION OF GUILT FOR THE EXONERATED CENTRAL PARK FIVE

In the late 1980s, Donald Trump publicly refused to grant a group of teenagers labeled the “Central Park Five” the presumption of innocence to which they were entitled under the law.21 Indeed, presuming them guilty of a brutal crime in Central Park, he effectively called for their executions before trial.22 Even after their convictions were vacated on the basis of incontrovertible evidence, Trump maintained that the young men were guilty.23

In the spring of 1989, Antron McCray, Kevin Richardson, Yusef Salaam, Raymond Santana, and Kharey Wise (the “Central Park Five” or the “Exonerated Central Park Five”)24 – five black and Latino teenagers from Harlem ranging in age from fourteen to sixteen years – were wrongly accused of beating (to near death) and raping a white female jogger in Central Park. These children were trapped within a divided New York – a city at once emerging from near-bankruptcy and entering a period of Wall Street-fueled “lavish conspicuous consumption,” and transitioning from the “empowerment of the Black Power Movement” to “disenfranchisement [] fueled by the Crack Era of the 1980s.”

Public discourse turned the horrific attack into an issue of race, as reflected by the media’s descriptions of the accused children in “animalistic” terms, which comparative analysis of press coverage in New York City in 1989 suggests were “reserved for black men [] accused of attacking white women.” The Central Park Five were labeled “wolf packs,” “rat packs,” “savages,” and “animals.” Moreover, press reports and the general public coined the crime a “wilding.”

Just two weeks after the attack on the jogger, before any of the accused teenagers had been tried and while the jogger remained in a coma, Donald Trump stepped in from the affluent side of the city’s divide to declare the teenagers guilty. He spent $85,000 on full-page advertisements in four New York City newspapers, including the New York Times, demanding the return of the death penalty and “implicitly calling for the boys to die.”

28 Indeed, the case of a black woman, raped two weeks later in Brooklyn by three men who threw her from the roof of a four-story building, received little media attention. See id. at 1349-50.

30 See Duru, supra note 27, at 1348.

31 The jogger never regained memory of the attack and therefore was unable to identify her rapist. See id. at 1362.

Although Trump did not name the teenagers, “it was clear to anyone in the city that he was referring to them” in his advertisements.34 Entitled “Bring Back the Death Penalty. Bring Back Our Police!,” Trump’s advertisements referenced the loss of safety in “the Park at dusk” and the threat of “roving bands of wild criminals” – language much like that used by the media at the time to describe the accused teens.35 Moreover, Trump specifically mentioned the attack on the jogger, writing, “At what point did we cross the line from the fine and noble pursuit of genuine civil liberties to the reckless and dangerously permissive atmosphere which allows criminals of every age to beat and rape a helpless woman . . . ?”36 All five accused children had already been “paraded in front of the cameras and had their names and addresses published,” but they received “more death threats after the papers ran Trump’s full-page screed.”37

With Trump’s help,38 and in utter violation of the presumption of innocence, the five teenagers’ convictions “were almost assured before the first juror was called.”39 Despite the absence of physical evidence against the teens, a timeline suggesting they were likely elsewhere in the park at the time of the attack on the jogger, and coerced “confessions” that were inconsistent with each other on nearly every major aspect of the crime,40 all five accused teenagers were convicted and sentenced to prison terms.41 As a result, they spent their adolescence – between seven and thirteen years – in prison for a sex crime they did not commit.42

In 2002, a serial rapist and murderer named Matias Reyes confessed to the crimes against the jogger and said he acted alone.43 DNA tests revealed that semen and pubic hair found at the crime scene belonged to Reyes and not to the Central Park Five.44 “Manhattan District Attorney Robert Morgenthau immediately launched an investigation” and concluded “that Reyes’s confession accurately described the crime scene and the jogger’s injuries, while the Central Park Five confessions were inconsistent with each other and with the physical evidence.”45 On December 5, 2002, Morgenthau filed with the court a fifty-eight page recommendation that the convictions of the Central Park Five be vacated.46 New York State Supreme Court Justice Charles Tejada vacated the convictions just two weeks later.47 The court order came four months after the last of the Exonerated Central Park Five had already been released from prison.48 By that point, all five young men had been “robbed of their young lives.”49

In 2003, the Exonerated Central Park Five filed a civil rights lawsuit seeking $250 million in damages from city authorities for false arrest and malicious prosecution.50 On September 5, 2014, the case finally settled for $41 million, or $1 million for each year of wrongful imprisonment that the five men had suffered collectively.51

Despite the volumes of exonerating evidence leading to vacated convictions, two months before the 2014 settlement was finalized, Donald Trump wrote a piece for The New York Daily News warning that settlement of the case would be “a disgrace.”52 He opined, “As a long-time resident of New York City, I think it is ridiculous for this case to be settled — and I hope that has not yet taken place. . . . Speak to the detectives on the case and try listening to the facts. These young men do not exactly have the pasts of angels.”53 In October 2016, Trump continued to maintain publicly that the Central Park Five were guilty, stating to CNN: “The fact that that case was settled with so much evidence against them is outrageous.”54

Sarah Burns, author of “The Central Park Five: The Untold Story Behind One of New York City’s Most Infamous Crimes” and co-director/writer/producer of “The Central Park Five” documentary,55 highlighted the injustice and racism behind Trump’s continued presumption of the young men’s guilt:

None of the Central Park Five had ever been arrested before, so Mr. Trump’s reference to their pasts has no basis in truth. The five were in the park that night, but they maintain that they did not participate in other attacks, and there is no evidence that they did.

So we are left with Mr. Trump’s presumption that because they were black and brown teenagers from Harlem, they must have committed a crime. The idea that teenagers who were in a park while crimes were being committed by others deserved to be labeled rapists and sent to prison for [] years is an affront to our Constitution.56

III. PRESUMPTION OF INNOCENCE FOR BRETT KAVANAUGH

After leveraging his prominence and vast financial resources to wield the presumption of guilt against the Central Park Five in 1989 (and beyond), as President, Trump turned around and touted the presumption of innocence in Justice Brett Kavanaugh’s defense during his confirmation to the United States Supreme Court. The President did so not for the principle’s intended purpose – to protect an innocent criminal defendant’s liberty and right to due process – but in the name of securing a lifetime appointment to the highest court of the land for a man who already enjoyed the profound privilege of presiding over cases on the District of Columbia Court of Appeals. Misappropriating the presumption of innocence well outside the criminal context in this way, Trump manipulated and extended the reach of biases that have long unjustly benefitted privileged white criminal defendants over poor defendants of color.

While the Exonerated Central Park Five came from modest beginnings, Kavanaugh enjoyed privilege throughout his life. Indeed, “Kavanaugh has never known a time without connections” to “the country’s most powerful . . . elites.” He is the son of a judge and a lobbyist, who raised him in Bethesda, Maryland, “a tony suburb” of Washington, D.C. Kavanaugh attended a private high school “largely populated by the sons of elites,” and received both his undergraduate and law school degrees from Yale.

As an extension of his lifelong privilege, unlike the Exonerated Central Park Five, Kavanaugh received every benefit of the doubt from President Trump. On September 26, 2018, the day before Dr. Christine Blasey Ford testified to the Senate Judiciary Committee about her allegations of sexual assault against then-Supreme Court nominee Brett Kavanaugh, the President answered press questions on the subject. Trump attributed the accusations of sexual misconduct by three separate women, including Dr. Ford, to a “big, fat con job” by the Democrats and he insisted “there was nothing to investigate . . . .” Asked if he considered all of the accusers “liars” and whether anything said at the hearing could make him withdraw Kavanaugh’s nomination, Trump maintained Kavanaugh’s innocence:

[T]his is one of the highest quality people that I’ve ever met. And everybody that knows him says the same thing, and these are all false to me. These are false accusations in certain cases, and certain cases even the media agrees with that. I can only say that what they’ve done to this man is incredible.”

In defending Kavanaugh, President Trump relied unabashedly on the presumption of innocence. He told reporters, “Always, I heard you’re innocent until proven guilty. I’ve heard this for so long and it’s such a beautiful phrase. In this case, you’re guilty until proven innocent. I think that is a very, very dangerous standard for our country.” Trump seemed to have forgotten about his own use of that “dangerous standard” against five innocent teenagers in 1989. While the passage of 30 years could explain such hypocrisy, in Trump’s case, it does not. Just two years prior to defending Kavanaugh, Trump had publicly criticized New York City’s settlement of the Central Park Five lawsuit on the theory that the young men were guilty despite extensive exonerating evidence and vacated convictions. In contrast, Trump’s defense of Kavanaugh continued despite evidence of Kavanaugh’s culpability. The day after Dr. Ford’s Senate testimony, the President described Dr. Ford as “a very credible witness” and her testimony as “very compelling.”68 Nonetheless, on October 4, the day before the Senate voted to end debate and move to a final vote on Kavanaugh’s confirmation, the President tweeted, “Due Process, Fairness and Common Sense are now on trial!”69 Moreover, the day the Senate confirmed Justice Kavanaugh’s nomination to the United States Supreme Court, despite Dr. Ford’s testimony that she was “one hundred percent” certain Kavanaugh sexually assaulted her, Trump told reporters that he was “a hundred percent” certain Kavanaugh was innocent.70

Trump’s hypocrisy is matched only by his profound misapplication of the presumption of innocence standard. He artificially superimposed the standard onto a non-criminal process for which it was never intended. Any threat to Kavanaugh’s confirmation to the United States Supreme Court could not possibly be compared to the life and liberty stakes of criminal defendants who therefore require special protection from presumptive guilt.71 Moreover, consequences aside, Kavanaugh’s confirmation process was procedurally incomparable to a criminal trial, as it lacked “the kind of extensive investigation that happens in the criminal justice system — the kind of investigation that makes the legal system’s high standard for culpability workable in the first place.”72 Republican Senators might have tried to justify their own pro-Kavanaugh invocations of the presumption of innocence and proof “beyond a reasonable doubt”73 with an 71 Nor could an unsuccessful nomination to the highest court of the land legitimately be compared to the costs confronted by those civil defendants whom Judge Wilkinson III deems worthy of a presumption of innocence. See infra Part I.

CONCLUSION

Presumed guilty from the start, the Exonerated Central Park Five waited a quarter of a century for the government to pay damages for unjustifiably stripping them of their freedom and their youth.75 Even then, Donald Trump continued to presume their guilt in the press.76 Brett Kavanaugh waited just 20 days after sexual assault allegations against him surfaced publicly to be confirmed onto the United States Supreme Court.77 Under the guise of due process, President Trump gave Kavanaugh his unequivocal support the entire time. The President’s inconsistent application of the presumption of innocence standard reflects and reinforces the ease with which the standard is disregarded when the lives of black and brown criminal defendants are at stake, but then quickly resurrected to perpetuate white privilege.

Christine Blasey Ford’s sexual assault allegations against Kavanaugh, Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-SC) said, “You have to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that it did happen.”
