Protective Orders and Commercial Information--Is Good Cause Good Enough?

Joseph R. Gagliano Jr.

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarship.law.stjohns.edu/lawreview

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://scholarship.law.stjohns.edu/lawreview/vol59/iss1/4

This Note is brought to you for free and open access by the Journals at St. John's Law Scholarship Repository. It has been accepted for inclusion in St. John's Law Review by an authorized editor of St. John's Law Scholarship Repository. For more information, please contact lasalar@stjohns.edu.
PROTECTIVE ORDERS AND COMMERCIAL INFORMATION--IS GOOD CAUSE GOOD ENOUGH?

The issuance of protective orders pursuant to rule 26(c)(7) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure is predicated upon a moving party's demonstration of good cause. Traditionally, motions seek-

1 Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(c)(7). Rule 26(c)(7) provides:
Upon motion by a party or by the person from whom discovery is sought, and for good cause shown, the court . . . may . . . order . . . (7) that a trade secret or other confidential research, development or commercial information not be disclosed or be disclosed only in a designated way . . .

Id. Rule 26(c)(7) gives the court the power to control the use of the materials discovered, Dore, Confidentiality Orders--The Proper Role of the Courts in Providing Confidential Treatment for Information Disclosed Through the Pretrial Discovery Process, 14 New Eng. L. Rev. 1, 7-8 (1978), and counterbalance the trial court's inability to limit significantly the scope of discovery, see Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(1); see also Dore, supra, at 6 (rules anticipate discovery without judicial supervision). But cf. Comment, Protective Orders Prohibiting Dissemination of Discovery Information: The First Amendment and Good Cause, 1980 Duke L.J. 766, 767 n.7 (in the course of discovery, parties will often be compelled to disclose confidential information).

District courts have attempted to comply with the Supreme Court's directive that discovery be liberal, see Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U.S. 495, 506 (1947), by compelling discovery of most materials and by protecting the disclosing party's interests with a protective order, Marcus, Myth and Reality in Protective Order Litigation, 69 Cornell L. Rev. 1, 7 (1983); see In re Halkin, 598 F.2d 179, 208 (D.C. Cir. 1979) (Wilkey, J., dissenting) (rule 26(c)(7) enables district courts to protect parties from abuse of discovery); see also Textured Yarn Co. v. Burkart-Schier Chem. Corp., 41 F.R.D. 158, 160 (E.D. Tenn. 1966) (court has broad discretion to grant protective orders); Ledge Hill Farms, Inc. v. W.R. Grace & Co., 6 Fed. R. Serv. 2d (Callaghan) 715, 716-17 (S.D.N.Y. 1962) (disclosure of trade secrets limited to litigation purposes). Protective orders allow discovery to proceed efficiently with a minimum amount of dispute over whether allegedly confidential materials are discoverable. See Note, Modification of Protective Orders: Balancing Practical Considerations and Addressing Constitutional Rights, 14 Suffolk U.L. Rev. 1011, 1036 (1980).

The broad scope of discovery permitted by the federal rules is intended to facilitate the flow of communication between litigants. Comment, supra, at 767 & n.7. The primary goal of the federal rules is to shift the focus from complicated pleadings to extensive discovery accompanied by simple notice pleading, thereby enhancing the pretrial preparation. See Dore, supra, at 2; Montgomery, Changes in Federal Practice Resulting from the Adoption of the New Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 1 F.R.D. 337, 346-47 (1941). The only limitation placed upon the scope of discovery is that the information be unprivileged and relevant to the subject matter of the claim. Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(1).

2 Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(c); 4 J. Moore & J. Lucas, Moore's Federal Practice § 26.68, at 26-491 (2d ed. 1983). The party moving for a protective order carries the burden of proving good cause. See Kiblen v. Retail Credit Co., 76 F.R.D. 402, 404 (E.D. Wash. 1977). What must be proved in order to carry this burden will depend largely upon the circumstances

103
ing these orders have been evaluated by balancing the moving party's expectations of confidentiality against the opposing party's expectations of use. Recent decisions, however, have injected a constitutional analysis into this traditional good cause test by examining both the moving party's fourth amendment right of privacy and the opposing party's first amendment right of free exand whether the moving party seeks to limit the scope of discovery, or simply to restrict the use of discovered materials. See In re Halkin, 598 F.2d 176, 210-11 (D.C. Cir. 1979) (Wilkey, J., dissenting); Note, supra note 1, at 1013 (issuance of protective order is discretionary). Good cause under rule 26(c) is established by demonstrating that unrestricted discovery or use of discovered materials will cause the moving party "annoyance, embarrassment, oppression, or undue burden or expense." Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(c); see Rhinehart v. Seattle Times Co., 98 Wash. 2d 225, 249, 654 P.2d 673, 698 (1982), aff'd, 104 S. Ct. 2199 (1984). The district court has discretion to decide whether good cause has been shown and usually requires a specific factual demonstration that serious harm will result without the order. See In re Halkin, 598 F.2d at 210; Comment, supra note 1, at 771. Mere conclusory allegations of harm are insufficient. See Rosenblatt v. Northwest Airlines, Inc., 54 F.R.D. 21, 23 (S.D.N.Y. 1971); Technical Tape Corp. v. Minnesota Mining & Mfg. Co., 18 F.R.D. 318, 321-22 (S.D.N.Y. 1955).

Trade secrets and business and commercial information have been traditionally entitled to protection from disclosure during litigation and have usually established the required showing for good cause. See Essex Wire Corp. v. Eastern Elec. Sales Co., 48 F.R.D. 308, 310 (E.D. Pa. 1969); cf. RESTATEMENT OF TORTS § 759 (1939) (tort cause of action for misuse of business information).

3 See National Polymer Prods., Inc. v. Borg-Warner Corp., 641 F.2d 418, 424 (6th Cir. 1981); Essex Wire Corp. v. Eastern Elec. Sales Co., 48 F.R.D. 308, 310 (E.D. Pa. 1969); United Airlines, Inc. v. United States, 26 F.R.D. 213, 217 (D. Del. 1960). Seeking to protect confidential commercial information, the moving party may assert a valid expectation of commercial privacy. See supra note 2. Similarly, the opposing party's right of access to discovery materials is conditional; the federal rules authorize the issuance of orders limiting this right to exclusive use in connection with trial preparation. See In re Halkin, 598 F.2d 176, 207 (D.C. Cir. 1979) (Wilkey, J., dissenting). But see Comment, In re San Juan Star: Discovery and the First Amendment, 34 BAYLOR L. REV. 229, 229-30 (1982) (litigant has valid interest in publicizing his suit). The opposing party's expectation of extrajudicial use of the discovered materials is frequently disappointed since many judges often issue protective orders sua sponte as a condition of compelling discovery. See Quinter v. Volkswagen of Am., 676 F.2d 969, 971 (3d Cir. 1982); In re "Agent Orange" Prod. Liab. Litig., 97 F.R.D. 424, 425 (E.D.N.Y. 1983). An opposing party may be motivated by a desire to use the discovered materials extrajudicially to affect the outcome of the trial, but such use cannot be deemed an expectation worthy of protection. See Marcus, supra note 1, at 63. The party contesting the protective order normally has little first amendment interest in the dissemination of the information obtained through the discovery process. Id. at 65. Once the discovered material is used at trial, however, the moving party's confidentiality interests in it are lost. See, e.g., Davis v. Romney, 55 F.R.D. 337, 344 (E.D. Pa. 1972) (information used at trial becomes part of public record); see National Polymer, 641 F.2d at 424.

In determining whether good cause exists, courts have also given consideration to the purposes underlying the discovery provisions, such as the narrowing of issues, the obtaining of evidence, and the need for adequate pretrial preparation. See Berry v. Haynes, 41 F.R.D. 243, 244 (S.D. Fla. 1966).
pression.\footnote{See Seattle Times Co. v. Rhinehart, 104 S. Ct. 2199, 2205-08 (1984); In re San Juan Star Co., 662 F.2d 108, 113-18 (1st Cir. 1981); In re Halkin, 598 F.2d 176, 186-91 (D.C. Cir. 1979). Until recently, the Halkin decision generally was regarded as the keynote decision in the constitutional treatment of discovery. See Marcus, supra note 1, at 2-3. According to the Halkin tripartite test, before a district court may issue a protective order: "[1] the harm posed by dissemination must be substantial and serious; [2] the restraining order must be narrowly drawn and precise; and [3] there must be no alternative means of protecting the public interest which intrudes less directly on expression." Halkin, 598 F.2d at 191. In addition, the district court must make extensive findings of fact on each of these three elements. Id. at 192.} Courts also have begun to recognize that corporations enjoy a constitutional right of privacy.\footnote{See G.M. Leasing Co. v. United States, 429 U.S. 338, 353 (1977); Mancusi v. DeForte, 392 U.S. 364, 367 (1968); See v. City of Seattle, 387 U.S. 541, 544-45 (1967). The corporate constitutional right of privacy, which is based upon the fourth amendment guarantee of freedom from unreasonable searches and seizures, was first recognized in 1906. See Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 43, 76 (1906); infra notes 55-59 and accompanying text.} Determining whether to grant a rule 26(c)(7) protective order therefore triggers a complex judicial balancing of conflicting constitutional rights.\footnote{Cf. Moskowitz v. Superior Court, 137 Cal. App. 3d 313, 316, 187 Cal. Rptr. 4, 6 (1982) (court weighed individual asserted right of privacy under California Constitution against need for discovered information); In re Halkin, 598 F.2d 176, 191 (D.C. Cir. 1979) (court considered public interests in discovery process and first amendment interests in unfettered expression). Cases reviewing protective order motions from a constitutional perspective illustrate the complexity of such review. See supra note 4. It is suggested that the juxtaposition of two conflicting constitutional rights that requires every district court reviewing a rule 26(c)(7) motion to engage in two constitutional rulings is antithetical to the principle of avoiding constitutional adjudication whenever possible. See Ashwander v. Tennessee Valley Auth., 297 U.S. 288, 347 (1936) (Brandeis, J., concurring) (matters should be resolved without constitutional ruling if possible); see also infra notes 74-79 and accompanying text.}

This Note will focus upon the potential constitutional clash between the right of privacy and freedom of expression that may arise under recent protective order jurisprudence. The validity of the assertion that corporations are entitled to a constitutional right of privacy will be examined and the continued application of a constitutional analysis to a litigant’s desire freely to express discovered information will be criticized. Lastly, this Note will suggest the inappropriateness of superimposing a constitutional analysis on protective order litigation and will propose a simplified judicial approach to rule 26(c)(7) motions.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF CONSTITUTIONAL SCRUTINY OF PROTECTIVE ORDERS

Until recently, rule 26(c)(7) motions were resolved solely by applying a good cause test that did not encompass an analysis of constitutional rights. Privacy expectations were based solely on the common-law notion that trade secrets revealed during litigation merit judicial protection. In Textured Yarn Co. v. Burkart-Schier Chemical Co., an action for misappropriating trade secrets gave rise to a motion for a protective order to prevent the secrets from being publicly disseminated. The court granted the motion in light of business factors and commercial fairness without addressing corporate expectations of a constitutional right of privacy. Similarly, in United States v. International Business Machines Corp., the Federal District Court for the Southern District of New York evaluated the severity of the business injury that the movant would suffer from disclosure in denying a motion for con-

---

8 See Essex Wire Corp. v. Eastern Elec. Sales Co., 48 F.R.D. 308, 310 (E.D. Pa. 1969); supra note 3; cf. RESTATEMENT OF TORTS § 759 (1939) (tort cause of action for misuse of business information). Traditionally, courts have applied one of three legal theories in protecting confidential commercial information: (1) the existence of property rights in the information, see Tabor v. Hoffman, 118 N.Y. 30, 37, 23 N.E. 12, 13 (1889); (2) the presence of a contractual agreement prohibiting disclosure, see Westervelt v. National Paper & Supply Co., 154 Ind. 673, 674, 57 N.E. 552, 554 (1900); or (3) the existence of a fiduciary duty not to disclose the information, see E.I. Du Pont De Nemours Powder Co. v. Masland, 244 U.S. 100, 102 (1917).
10 See id. at 159.
11 See id. at 159-60.
13 See id. at 48-49.
tinued protection of a deposition from dissemination. In International Business Machines, Chief Judge Edelstein acknowledged that the movant, relying on the common-law tradition of protecting trade secrets, came to court with an expectation that the secrets would be protected, and, as in Textured Yarns, the International Business Machines court ruled on the motion without acknowledging a constitutional expectation of privacy.

Originally, an opposing party's expectations of use of commercial information obtained through the litigation process also were evaluated on a non-constitutional level. In International Products Corp. v. Koons, the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, in issuing an order to protect the deposition of a corporate officer in a libel action, discarded without discussion the appellant's contenttion that protective orders implicate constitutional rights in instances of disclosure of discovered information. In Rodgers v. United States Steel Corp., the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit suggested that even if protective orders did implicate first amendment rights of dissemination, such rights were waived by the litigant's decision to enjoy the benefits of discovery.

These earlier holdings can be contrasted with those of In re Halkin and In re San Juan Star Co. The plaintiffs in Halkin, seeking relief for violation of their constitutional rights, alleged that they were being scrutinized by the CIA because of their involvement in lawful anti-war protest activities. When the plaintiffs expressed their intention to disseminate certain discovered information, the government successfully moved for a protective order. Reversing the trial court's decision to grant a protective

---

14 See id. at 42-43.
15 See id. at 45.
16 See id. at 42; Textured Yarn, 41 F.R.D. at 159.
18 325 F.2d 403 (2d Cir. 1963).
19 See id. at 407.
20 536 F.2d 1001 (3d Cir. 1975).
21 See id. at 1006. Although Koons and Rodgers are recognized as the earliest attempts by litigants to engraft a constitutional analysis upon protective order litigation, it should be noted that neither case dealt with commercial information. See Rodgers, 536 F.2d at 1002-04; Koons, 325 F.2d at 404-05.
22 598 F.2d 176 (D.C. Cir. 1979).
23 662 F.2d 108 (1st Cir. 1981).
24 See 598 F.2d at 179-80.
25 See id. at 180-82.
order, the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit applied a complex constitutional analysis and concluded that protective orders, like prior restraints, trigger the strictest judicial scrutiny.\(^{26}\)

The Court of Appeals for the First Circuit chose a different approach from that of the \textit{Halkin} court in \textit{In re San Juan Star Co.}\(^{27}\) The \textit{San Juan Star} litigation arose from a series of terrorist activities in Puerto Rico.\(^{28}\) The district court issued several protective orders to curtail possible prejudicial effects on the jury caused by the high degree of publicity the trial was receiving.\(^{29}\) Ruling on a challenge to the protective order, the First Circuit concluded that only limited first amendment concerns were present in protective order litigation.\(^{30}\) The \textit{San Juan Star} court concluded that the prior restraint approach was inapposite and asserted that "the appropriate measure of [these] limitations [is] a standard of 'good cause' that incorporates a 'heightened sensitivity' to the First Amendment concerns at stake . . . ."\(^{31}\)

\textit{Tavoulareas v. Washington Post Co.}\(^{32}\) represented the first instance of collision between privacy and expression in the context of protective orders.\(^{33}\) In \textit{Tavoulareas}, Mobil Oil Corporation intervened in a libel action between William Tavoulareas, its president, and the Washington Post to protect confidential information that was ordered to be produced.\(^{34}\) The district court lifted the seal on the documents,\(^{35}\) but it was reinstated by the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit.\(^{36}\) The appellate court concluded that only a very limited right of free expression attached to discovered materials\(^{37}\) and that right was insufficient to rebut Mobil's fourth-amendment-based corporate right of privacy.\(^{38}\) The circuit court subsequently vacated and remanded the case for reconsidera-

\(^{26}\) See \textit{id.} at 183-96.
\(^{27}\) 662 F.2d 108 (1st Cir. 1981).
\(^{28}\) See \textit{id.} at 110-11.
\(^{29}\) \textit{Id.} at 111.
\(^{30}\) \textit{Id.} at 113-14.
\(^{31}\) \textit{Id.} at 116.
\(^{33}\) See 724 F.2d at 1017-29.
\(^{34}\) \textit{Id.} at 1012-15.
\(^{35}\) \textit{Id.} at 1013, 1015.
\(^{36}\) \textit{Id.} at 1029.
\(^{37}\) \textit{Id.} at 1025-29.
\(^{38}\) \textit{Id.} at 1029.
tion in light of the Supreme Court's decision in Seattle Times Co. v. Rhinehart. Rhinehart represents an effort by the Supreme Court to clarify the confused precedent addressing the constitutional ramifications of protective orders. In Rhinehart, the leader of a religious organization, Keith Rhinehart, sued the Seattle Times for libel, and, during pretrial preparation, the newspaper sought discovery of confidential financial information from Rhinehart and his organization. The Supreme Court of Washington affirmed the trial court's decision to protect the information from dissemination. Asserting that its first amendment rights had been violated, the Seattle Times petitioned for and was granted certiorari by the United States Supreme Court. Writing for the Court, Justice Powell affirmed the state court decision, concluding that a middle-level constitutional analysis should be applied to rule 26(c) motions. The Supreme Court instructed lower courts reviewing protective order motions to "consider whether the 'practice in question [furthers] an important or substantial government interest unrelated to the suppression of expression' and whether 'the limitation of First Amendment freedoms [is] no greater than is necessary or essential to the protection of the particular governmental interest involved.'"

CORPORATE CONSTITUTIONAL PRIVACY: A MISCONCEPTION

The continuing expansion of corporate constitutional rights has often led to the conclusion that confidential commercial information is protected by a constitutional right of privacy. Indeed, the Tavoulareas court disregarded precedent and equated a cor-

---

41 See id. at 2205.
42 Id. at 2202-04.
44 Seattle Times Co. v. Rhinehart, cert. granted, 104 S. Ct. 64 (1983).
46 Id.
47 Id. at 2207 (quoting Procunier v. Martinez, 416 U.S. 396, 413 (1974)).
48 See supra notes 5 & 6.
poration’s privacy expectations in confidential commercial information to an individual’s expectation of protection from forced disclosure of personal information. While the Supreme Court has previously recognized a corporate right of privacy, this right has not been deemed coextensive with the penumbral privacy rights enjoyed by individuals. Traditionally, corporate privacy expectations were based upon the search and seizure clause of the fourth amendment. While the fourth amendment right of privacy for enumerated anywhere in the Constitution, but is a fundamental right based on a conglomeration of constitutional protections. See Griswold, 381 U.S. at 482; J. NOWAK, R. ROTUNDA & J. YOUNG, CONSTITUTIONAL LAW 458-61 (2d ed. 1983). Protection against invasions of “the sanctity of a man’s home and the privacies of life” is provided by the first, fourth, and fifth amendments. Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616, 630 (1885). Traditionally, this right has been perceived as exceptionally personal and individual, and has been conferred to prevent forced disclosure of personal information. See Nixon, 433 U.S. at 435; Whalen, 429 U.S. at 599; Fadjo v. Coon, 633 F.2d 1172, 1175 (5th Cir. 1981).

Constitutional privacy is rooted in human values and natural law. See J. NOWAK, R. ROTUNDA & J. YOUNG, supra, at 459; see also Griswold, 381 U.S. at 486 (right of privacy based on sanctity of marriage); R. STEVENSON, CORPORATIONS AND INFORMATION—SECRECY, ACCESS AND DISCLOSURE 51 (1980) (right of privacy grounded in human experience). It has been referred to as the right to be left alone. See Rowan v. United States Post Office Dep’t, 397 U.S. 728, 736 (1970); Davis v. United States, 328 U.S. 582, 587 (1946).

See supra notes 49-50; infra note 61.

See United States v. Morton Salt Co., 338 U.S. 632, 652 (1950) (corporations have fourth amendment right of privacy); Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. United States, 251 U.S. 385, 392 (1920) (corporations protected from unreasonable searches); United States v. Hubbard, 650 F.2d 293, 305-06 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (widespread acceptance of corporate privacy expectations under Constitution and state law); see also United States v. Universal Mfg.
Corporations has been affirmed in some recent decisions, it is suggested that an historical examination reveals that the policies underlying this right have ceased to exist.

The corporate fourth amendment right of privacy was an outgrowth of the doctrine of economic due process. This doctrine was a 19th-century judicial response to Congress' failure to endow corporations with "constitutional personhood" and served as the cornerstone upon which various corporate constitutional rights were erected. The doctrine of economic due process, however, was

See Note, The Corporation and the Constitution: Economic Due Process and Corporate Speech, 90 Yale L.J. 1833, 1845-50 (1981). The economic due process doctrine stressed the importance of private ownership of property. Id. at 1847. The doctrine emphasized the freedom of the "person," and treated fictitious and natural persons almost identically. Id. at 1848. Such treatment allowed the courts to emphasize the freedom to contract, while focusing entirely upon the invading power of the states, and virtually ignoring the effects of corporate accumulation of power. Id. at 1848-49. As the doctrine of economic due process expanded, the Supreme Court was frequently required to determine to what extent democratic authority could interfere with private organizations. Id. at 1845-46. The difficulty created by the concept of "fictional personhood" became apparent when dealing with constitutional relationships. See Ratner, Corporations and the Constitution, 15 U.S.F.L. Rev. 11, 11 (1981). Individual and governmental units were the only types of entities mentioned in the Constitution; therefore the courts attempted to deal with corporate constitutional claims by constitutionally classifying the corporation. Id. at 11-12. The Supreme Court resolved this dilemma by relying upon the determination that corporations were "artificial beings" in Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 518, 636 (1819).

See e.g., Insurance Co. v. New Orleans, 13 F. Cas. 67, 68 (C.C.D. La. 1870) (No. 7,052) (only natural persons can be constitutional persons); see also Graham, An Innocent Abroad: The Constitutional Corporate "Person," 2 UCLA L. Rev. 155, 166 (1955) (that corporation not constitutional person was law of the land). During the Civil War period the number of corporations significantly increased and interstate activity flourished, particularly in the railroad and insurance industries. See Graham, supra, at 166. Faced with an inactive Congress and overactive state legislatures, the Supreme Court began to invalidate state actions that claimed corporate property without due process. Id. at 167. Thus, in 1880, the Court granted corporations fourteenth amendment protection from state actions perceived as injurious to the private ownership of property. See Santa Clara County v. Southern Pac. R.R., 118 U.S. 395, 410 (1886). In Santa Clara, the Court refused even to hear an argument on the issue of corporate "constitutional personhood," and simply held categorically that corporations were entitled to constitutional protections. Id. at 396.

See Graham, supra note 56, at 185-87; Ratner, supra note 56, at 15; Note, supra note 55, at 1835-36, 1847. In 1906, the corporate right of privacy under the fourth amendment was first recognized in Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 43, 76 (1906). However, the Hale Court concluded that individuals acting in corporate form retained a right of privacy under the abandoned when congressional regulation of economic activity increased in the 1930's. In fact, by 1941 the Supreme Court had overruled most of the significant economic due process decisions. In so doing, the Court failed to consider the status of a growing body of substantive corporate constitutional rights that were an outgrowth of the economic due process doctrine. It is suggested that the privacy rights of individual corporate directors, officers, and shareholders are the only appropriate vestiges of this long discarded legal theory. Unfortunately, recent decisions, and particularly the assertion that corporations have a constitutional right of

---

footnote: 5

60 See H. Henn, Handbook on the Law of Corporations and Other Business Enterprises 25 (2d ed. 1970); R. Hessen, supra note 57, at 41; Ratner, supra note 55, at 12-13. It has been deemed illogical and dangerous to bestow rights that are rooted in human values upon the corporate person. Ratner, supra note 55, at 29. Like all other types of organizations, the corporation draws qualities from its members and thus may draw upon the rights of its shareholders, officers, and directors, but it cannot claim that those rights personally vest within the corporate entity itself. See R. Hessen, supra note 57, at 41-42.

privacy, signal a partial rebirth of the doctrine of economic due process at a time when its protection is no longer needed. The recognition of a limited corporate right of privacy creates a temptation to ignore the logical and historical inconsistencies underlying the doctrine. Moreover, by embracing a corporate constitutional right of privacy the courts have ignored the existing state regulations that require corporations to disclose significant amounts of commercial information. Since the constitutionality of these regulations has been repeatedly affirmed, it is submitted that the continued recognition of the corporate constitutional right of privacy is logically inconsistent.

FIRST AMENDMENT EXPRESSION AND PROTECTIVE ORDERS

Acknowledgment of a litigant’s first amendment right freely to express information obtained through discovery inevitably requires the trial court to perform an intricate and protracted constitu-

---

62 See supra note 5 and accompanying text.
63 See, e.g., First Nat’l Bank v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765, 777 (1978). The Bellotti rationale resembles the economic due process analysis to the extent that it ignores the disparity in private financial power between corporations and individuals through the use of the freedom to contract theory, see id. at 790, and disregards the difference between corporate and natural persons, see id. at 777-83; Note, supra note 55, at 1853-56.
65 See Ratner, supra note 55, at 27. Many regulatory schemes require corporations to disclose substantial amounts of commercial information. See Oklahoma Press Publishing Co. v. Walling, 327 U.S. 186, 204 (1946); E. Bloustein, Individual and Group Privacy 142 (1978). Due to the nature of their business activities, certain industries are subjected to more extensive regulation than others. See Colomnde Catering Corp. v. United States, 397 U.S. 72, 75 (1970); Civil Aeronautics Bd. v. United Airlines, Inc., 542 F.2d 394, 399 (7th Cir. 1976). Moreover, corporations cannot validly assert significant privacy expectations, Oklahoma Press Publishing Co., 327 U.S. at 205, and they can expect substantially fewer privacy rights than individuals when they incorporate under the laws of a particular state, see G.M. Leasing Corp. v. United States, 459 U.S. 338, 353 (1976); Ratner, supra note 55, at 22-23. To justify an intrusion on corporate privacy, the government need prove only that the regulatory statute is reasonably definite and is reasonably related to a valid investigatory purpose. Civil Aeronautics Bd., 542 F.2d at 399; see E. Bloustein, supra, at 143. As a substantive constitutional right, however, the corporate right of privacy could only be overcome by a compelling, subordinating governmental interest. See Ratner, supra note 55, at 27.
66 See, e.g., Wright v. SEC, 112 F.2d 89, 94-95 (2d Cir. 1940) (upholding constitutionality of Securities Exchange Act of 1934); Oklahoma-Texas Trust v. SEC, 100 F.2d 888, 890 (10th Cir. 1939) (upholding constitutionality of Securities Act of 1933).
This right was found to be an unqualified right of free expression by the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit in In re Halkin. The Rhinehart decision, while acknowledging the existence of the right, refuted the Halkin proposition that freedom of expression is unqualified. It is submitted that the acceptance of even a qualified right to express information obtained through discovery is both unnecessary and contrary to the basic policies underlying the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The Federal Rules predicate the issuance of a protective order upon a showing of good cause, requiring the moving party to establish that dissemination would cause “annoyance, embarrassment, oppression, or undue burden or expense.” The court may issue the order if a party can satisfactorily demonstrate that dissemination will result in one of these five occurrences. In light of the strong presumption of constitutionality attributed to the Federal Rules, the moving party’s establishment of one of the five 68 598 F.2d 176, 190 (D.C. Cir. 1979); see also Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817, 834 (1974) (Constitution does not require that government make available to press information not shared with public; government has no affirmative duty to give out information not generally available); Zemel v. Rusk, 381 U.S. 1, 17 (1965) (right to speak and publish does not include right to gather information). The Halkin court’s acceptance of Pell and Zemel clearly indicates that there is no first amendment right to receive information through discovery. Halkin, 598 F.2d at 190. Although the right freely to express materials discovered was first raised by a media litigant, see Reliance Ins. Co. v. Barron’s, 428 F. Supp. 200, 201 (S.D.N.Y. 1977) (defendant alleged protective order was violative of freedom of the press), the Halkin court indicated that such a right is generally available to all litigants, see Halkin, 598 F.2d at 191; see also Sinclair, Protective Orders: How Much Protection Do They Really Offer?, Nat’l L.J., Mar. 2, 1981, at 26, col. 2.

70 FED. R. Civ. P. 26(c); see supra note 2.
71 FED. R. Civ. P. 26(c); see supra notes 1-3 and accompanying text.
72 FED. R. Civ. P. 26(c); see supra notes 1-3; see also Rhinehart v. Seattle Times Co., 98 Wash. 2d 226, 232, 654 P.2d 673, 677 (1982) (court is authorized to prohibit use of discovery information for unauthorized purposes upon establishment of one of five factors cited in rule 26(c)), aff’d, 104 S. Ct. 2199 (1984).

Indeed, all statutes are generally entitled to a presumption of constitutionality. 2A STATUTES AND STATUTORY CONSTRUCTION § 45.11, at 33 (L. Sands ed. 1973). The federal rules are no exception. See 3A STATUTES AND STATUTORY CONSTRUCTION, supra, § 67.10, at 236.
statutory bases for good cause should satisfy any constitutional implications that the drafters of the rules, the Supreme Court, or Congress anticipated would arise.74

The Halkin court's superimposition of a complex first amendment analysis upon the good cause test implies that rule 26(c) is unconstitutional on its face.75 Although Rhinehart narrows this implication by determining that protective order motions should not be reviewed under a traditional first amendment strict scrutiny analysis,76 even the requirement of a middle-level balancing test, it is submitted, gives rise to an implication of unconstitutionality. It is suggested that such an implication is insufficient to rebut the strong presumption of constitutionality with which the federal rules are vested.77 It is further suggested that a protective order, as well as the entire discovery process, involves a form of expression outside the scope of the first amendment.78 If information obtained through discovery is deemed unprotected by first amendment guarantees, any limitation on the expression of such information

74 See 28 U.S.C. § 2072 (1982). Any standard such as the good cause test that is incorporated into the federal rules at least must be presumed constitutional in that the Advisory Committee, the Supreme Court, and Congress have all given the rules a stamp of approval. See Hopkinson, The New Federal Rules of Civil Procedure Compared with the Former Federal Equity Rules and the Wisconsin Code, 23 MARQUETTE L. REV. 159, 159 (1939). Originally, the good cause test was located in rule 30(b). FED. R. CIV. P. 30(b) (original 1938 version), reprinted in 1 F.R.D. at 16 (1940). The good cause test, along with the other Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, was reviewed in hearings before the House and Senate Judiciary Committees and was not changed. See Hopkinson, supra, at 159.

75 Cf. In re Halkin, 598 F.2d 176, 205 (D.C. Cir. 1979) (Wilkey, J., dissenting) (only good cause standard need be met to establish constitutionality of protective orders). Judge Wilkey concluded that the standard embodied in the federal rules is constitutional; good cause represents the constitutionally acceptable standard required for the issuance of a protective order. Id. at 206, 209 (Wilkey, J., dissenting). It is suggested that Judge Wilkey relied, sub silentio, upon the following syllogism: the federal rules are constitutional; the good cause test is part of the federal rules; therefore, the good cause test is constitutional.

77 See Hanna v. Plumer, 380 U.S. 460, 471-74 (1965). In Hanna, the Supreme Court concluded that even statutory provisions that are only arguably procedural are entitled to a presumption of constitutionality. See id. at 472-73.

cannot be an unlawful prior restraint. Indeed, Justices Douglas and Brennan, two of the strongest advocates of a broad interpretation of the first amendment, have indicated that a court's exercise of discretion to limit the use of discovered materials implicates no constitutional issues.

Cf. Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 309-10 (1940) (punishment of unprotected speech not unconstitutional). Orders restraining extrajudicial comment in some instances have been found to be prior restraints. See, e.g., Rodgers v. United States Steel Corp., 536 F.2d 1001, 1007-08 (3d Cir. 1976); Reliance Ins. Co. v. Barron's, 428 F. Supp. 200, 204-05 (S.D.N.Y. 1977). However, some courts have held that no first amendment interests are infringed by protective orders. See, e.g., International Prods. Corp. v. Koons, 325 F.2d 403, 407 (2d Cir. 1963) (no constitutional problem with respect to information obtained through depositions); see also Comment, supra note 1, at 773-74 (first amendment not violated by protective orders restricting dissemination of discovery information).

At common law, unreviewable administrative licensing or censorship programs that required certain types of information to be approved prior to publication were called prior restraints. Comment, First Amendment—Federal Procedure—Dissemination of Discovery Materials is Constitutionally Protected: In re Halkin, 55 NOTRE DAME LAW. 424, 426 (1980). The concept of prior restraints has since been expanded to include court orders that restrain speech and are unreviewable because of the collateral bar rule. See Walker v. City of Birmingham, 388 U.S. 307, 318-21 (1967) (contempt citation for violating court order cannot raise claim of constitutionality of order due to collateral bar rule).

Admittedly, protective orders do bear some similarity to prior restraints. First, violation of a protective order leads to a contempt proceeding, which, similar to a prior restraint, affords none of the procedural protections guaranteed in criminal prosecutions; second, both protective orders and prior restraints act upon specific individuals and increase the possibility of a chilling effect in the future; and, third, violation of either is a direct attack on the court's prestige, which often causes the court to augment the punishment in order to avenge the attack on its authority. See Comment, Discovery and the First Amendment, 21 WM. & MARY L. REV. 331, 343 (1979) [hereinafter cited as Discovery]. Even the middle-level constitutional scrutiny adopted by Rhinehart, however, will result in upholding the validity of protective orders under only the strictest of circumstances. Cf. Comment, supra note 1, at 785. Unfortunately, this undermines the purpose of protective orders, which is to serve as a "safeguard for the protection of parties . . . on account of the unlimited right of discovery given by rule 26." Advisory Committee on Rules for Civil Procedure, Rules of Civil Procedure for the District Courts of the United States, S. Doc. No. 101, 76th Cong., 1st Sess. 248 (1939) [hereinafter cited as Committee on Rules]. If discovered information can be classified as unprotected under the first amendment due to the circumstances under which it is received, see Schenk v. United States, 249 U.S. 47, 52 (1919), then restraining dissemination of such information would require only procedural protection, see Note, supra note 4, at 1652. In Rodgers v. United States Steel Corp., 536 F.2d 1001, 1007 (3d Cir. 1976), the Third Circuit took this approach by simply giving enough scrutiny to insure that protected speech was not restrained along with unprotected speech. See id.

The restraint imposed by judicially limiting the use of information obtained through discovery is no more severe than the restraint imposed by federal statutory schemes that protect confidential material from dissemination. Unlike gag orders, which completely foreclose a party from extrajudicial comment on pending litigation, a protective order permits a litigant to comment freely on his claim, and restricts only comment on information deemed confidential by the court. The constitutionality of both federal privacy acts and gag orders has been upheld. Although there is widespread acceptance of the right freely to express materials received through discovery, it is suggested that the purposes of discovery and the court's inherent powers to control its own processes indicate that no such right should exist. It is further submitted that limiting discovery through protective orders is an act of internal judicial management that should not trigger an analysis of substantive rights.

\[\text{See Rodgers v. United States Steel Corp., 536 F.2d 1001, 1006 (3d Cir. 1976) (dictum). The Rodgers court dealt with a protective order that precluded dissemination of both discovered information and information acquired independently of the court's processes. Id. at 1006-07. The court did not pass on the discovered information, but ruled that restraint of independently acquired information was impermissible. Id. at 1009. The Rodgers court stated, in dictum, that any right to disseminate the discovered materials would be waived. Id. at 1006.} \]

\[\text{See, e.g., Baldridge v. Shapiro, 455 U.S. 345 (1982); United States v. Mangan, 575 F.2d 32 (2d Cir. 1978), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 931 (1979); United States v. Tangerina, 412 F.2d 661 (10th Cir. 1969).} \]

\[\text{See Marcus, supra note 1, at 1-2; supra note 4 and accompanying text.} \]

\[\text{See, e.g., Flaherty v. Coughlin, 713 F.2d 10, 13 (2d Cir. 1983) (within discretion of court to determine discovery suitable for circumstance); United States v. Balistrieri, 606 F.2d 216, 221 (7th Cir. 1979) (court has authority to limit discovery), cert. denied, 446 U.S. 917 (1980); Krekel Publications, Inc. v. Waukesha Freeman, Inc., 98 F.R.D. 745, 746 (B.D. Wis. 1983) (constraints on discovery are within discretion of trial court); see also Dore, supra note 1, at 8 (federal courts infer that imposition of reasonable constraints on use or accessibility of confidential information obtained through discovery is within judicial power). But cf. Societe Internationale Pour Participations Industrielles Et Commerciales, S.A. v. Rogers, 357 U.S. 197, 209 (1958) (procedural rules cannot ignore constitutional limitations). Even before the federal rules were adopted, courts possessed discretionary power to control dissemination of information involved in the judicial process. See, e.g., E.I. Du Pont} \]
Prior to the Rhinehart decision, the Supreme Court had indicated that a court could restrain dissemination of information obtained through pretrial discovery if it were necessary to insure fairness to all parties under the circumstances. The same considerations would appear to justify shielding discovered materials from a litigant's request for dissemination. The broad discovery provisions of the federal rules are intended to enable litigants to prepare adequately for trial. In fact, the only expectation of litigants that the drafters of the federal rules intended to foster was adequate trial preparation.

A litigant, therefore, cannot legitimately demand to receive discovered information since it is received as a privilege granted by the court. In its discretion, the court may limit or condition that... privilege.\textsuperscript{92} While the conditional privilege approach may appear to conflict with the general principle that the right to express information exists regardless of the informational source,\textsuperscript{93} the Supreme Court has concluded that when information is obtained through a government-conferred privilege, the use of such information may be constitutionally limited.\textsuperscript{94}

When considered in light of the tendency of judges to resolve motions for protective orders solely on the good cause test without reaching the constitutional questions,\textsuperscript{95} the Rhinehart holding creates the impression that the right freely to express information obtained through discovery is of little consequence.\textsuperscript{96} Indeed, as the joyed by a person, company, or class, beyond the common advantages of other citizens.” BLACK’S LAW DICTIONARY 1077 (5th ed. 1979); see Knoll Golf Club v. United States, 179 F. Supp. 377, 380 (D.N.J. 1959) (peculiar benefit not enjoyed by all). Rights, while varying in type and degree, are those powers shared equally among all members of society. See BLACK’S LAW DICTIONARY, supra, at 1189-90. Privileges are generally considered less indelible than rights and more susceptible to limitation and restriction. See Hohfeld, Some Fundamental Legal Conceptions as Applied in Judicial Reasoning, 23 YALE L.J. 16, 28-33 (1913).

\textsuperscript{92} Cf. Snepp v. United States, 444 U.S. 507, 510-12 (1980) (per curiam) (government conferring privilege of employment may restrict expression of matters related to it); Picker- ing v. Board of Educ., 391 U.S. 563, 568 (1968) (government cannot demand complete waiver of first amendment right for privilege of employment but can diminish or condition such right). A court’s restriction upon the use of discovered information may appear as conditioning a privilege on the waiver of a right, cf. McAuliffe v. Mayor of New Bedford, 155 Mass. 216, 220, 29 N.E. 517, 517 (1892) (conditional privilege may extract right), a practice that has been questioned, see Frost & Frost Trucking Co. v. Railroad Comm’n, 271 U.S. 583, 593-94 (1926) (although state may grant privilege upon condition of waiving a right, it may not demand waiver of constitutional right). However, conditioning discovery upon a limitation of the use of the discovered materials does not involve a right-privilege waiver if one accepts the premise that discovered material is beyond the scope of first amendment protection. See supra note 78 and accompanying text.

\textsuperscript{93} See New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713, 732 (1971) (White, J., concurring) (right to express not lost due to circumstances under which party obtained information). But see Liberty Lobby, Inc. v. Pearson, 390 F.2d 489, 491 (D.C. Cir. 1968) (upon proper showing, first amendment may yield when there has been invasion of privacy).

\textsuperscript{94} Snepp v. United States, 444 U.S. 507, 510-512 (1980) (per curiam). In Snepp, the defendant wrote a book detailing some of his experiences working for the CIA in South Vietnam. Id. at 507. An express agreement of his employment, however, was that he would not publish any information concerning his activities with the CIA without prior approval. Id. at 507-08. The government, seeking injunctive relief and an order imposing a constructive trust on the proceeds of the book, brought suit against Snepp for breach of contract. Id. at 508. The Supreme Court held that Snepp’s breach of an employment condition “irreparably harmed the United States Government,” id. at 513, and that a constructive trust should be imposed on the profits, id. at 516.

\textsuperscript{95} See In re Halkin, 598 F.2d 176, 209 (D.C. Cir. 1979) (Wilkey, J., dissenting) (first result in Rhinehart indicates, if the countervailing interests are strong, the right will succumb to them.\textsuperscript{97} However, it is submitted that the mere recognition of a first amendment right to disseminate discovered materials burdens courts and contravenes the spirit of the federal rules.\textsuperscript{98} Requiring a first amendment analysis hinders the "just, speedy, and inexpensive determination of every action"—the goal underlying the federal rules—because it draws the district court into a complex and time-consuming balancing process.\textsuperscript{100} In addition, it is submitted that the interposition of a constitutional analysis increases the necessity for judicial intervention at the pretrial stage\textsuperscript{101} and focuses judicial attention away from the valid expectations of the litigants.\textsuperscript{102}

The litigant's right freely to express discovered materials threatens the use of stipulated protective orders.\textsuperscript{103} Some decisions have implied that the right to express information obtained through discovery would outweigh even the use of purely consensual confidentiality agreements.\textsuperscript{104} Limiting the use of protective \textsuperscript{97} See Rhinehart, 104 S. Ct. at 2199. Rhinehart requires that a first amendment analysis must always be performed before a protective order can properly be issued. Id. In cases dealing with commercial information, such as Tavoulareas, the first amendment claims are likely to be minimal and the confidentiality interests great; therefore, the Rhinehart analysis would not appear to hinder the granting of a protective order. See Comment, supra note 79, at 434.

\textsuperscript{98} Cf. Rhinehart, 98 Wash. 2d at 248, 654 P.2d at 685 (first amendment analysis unduly complex and onerous); see also Comment, supra note 96, at 1553 (federal rules give courts power to restrict use of materials subject to discovery).

\textsuperscript{99} See supra notes 4-6 and accompanying text.

\textsuperscript{100} Cf. Comment, supra note 1, at 768 (discovery should normally proceed with minimal judicial intervention). The Rhinehart test will also make stipulated protection agreements virtually impossible. Cf. infra notes 103-04 and accompanying text.

\textsuperscript{102} Stipulated protective orders are agreements between litigants, bilateral in nature, in which each party receives corresponding rights of access and protection of disclosed materials. See Marcus, supra note 1, at 9; Sinclair, supra note 68, at 26, col. 1. Stipulated protective orders free the court and the parties from the necessity and expense of litigating confidentiality issues. Marcus, supra note 1, at 2.

\textsuperscript{103} See United States v. Marchetti, 466 F.2d 1309, 1313 (4th Cir.) (contracts containing orders will cause parties to assert various immunities and evidentiary privileges in order to secure confidentiality, thus increasing the need for substantive pretrial determinations. It is suggested that the congressionally and judicially approved good cause test is sufficient to accommodate the various interests that arise in protective order litigation.

CONCLUSION

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure have created an efficient and organized discovery system that functions as a crucial complement to the simple notice pleading used in the federal courts. Decisions that have interjected constitutional considerations into the discovery process threaten the efficiency and vitality of that process. This Note has proposed the abandonment of the doctrines of the litigant's first amendment right freely to express information obtained through discovery and the corporate constitutional right of privacy. It is possible justly to resolve rule 26(c)(7) motions without resorting to these troubling doctrines. To the extent that Rhinehart furthers these doctrines, it should be overruled. Whether the expectations of privacy of a corporation are valid should be determined based upon the common-law tradition of affording protection to commercial information when such protection does not impede the judicial process, rather than upon constitutional protections. These expectations should be balanced against the opposing party's practical, not constitutional, expectations of use. A litigant seeking to discover commercial information can validly assert only the expectation of use in connection with trial preparation. If a protective order is deemed necessary, and such an order would not impair the opposing party's expectation of use, then such an order could be issued.

Joseph R. Gagliano, Jr.