ing is not embraced within the proper intendment of the arbitration clauses.²⁰⁸

Of course, if the arbitration clause expressly provides for such claims, they will be allowed; but absent an express inclusion, the arbitral process would be an unending one if such claims were permitted. If the plaintiff were successful in bringing to arbitration such a dispute, there would be little doubt that another proceeding would subsequently be initiated by the prior defendant on the same grounds.

The second decision, Hull Dye & Print Works, Inc. v. Riegel Textile Corp.,²⁰⁹ involved an arbitration clause which stated, in part, that

[a]ny controversy arising under or in relation to the contract or any modification thereof may be settled by arbitration or by suit in any court having jurisdiction, as the Mill [Hull] shall direct.²¹⁰

On the basis of the clause, Riegel attempted to compel arbitration. The court noted, however, that the phraseology employed in the arbitration clause clearly indicated that only Hull was to have the option of proceeding to arbitration or instituting litigation:

The clause . . . is not a contract for arbitration of controversies but rather a grant to Hull of a unilateral right to arbitrate. Neither party is required to arbitrate.²¹¹

As noted at the outset, both Steinberg and Hull demonstrate the importance of the arbitration clause itself. They should serve as reminders to the practitioner that careful analysis of the wording employed in the clauses will often be outcome-determinative.

CPLR 7501: Arbitration stayed without prejudice where notice of intention to arbitrate did not specify the nature of the controversy.

CPLR 7501 provides for the specific enforcement of an agreement to arbitrate "without regard to the justiciable character of the controversy," thus precluding the court from passing upon the merits of the dispute. An application to compel arbitration may be opposed on only three grounds: (1) absence of a valid agreement to arbitrate; (2) non-compliance with an agreement; (3) tolling of the state of limitations.²¹² Unless one of the above grounds is established, arbitration must be ordered.

In Lease Plan Fleet Corp. v. Johnson Transportation, Inc.,²¹³ the parties entered into a leasing agreement which provided for arbitration of all controversies pertaining to the agreement. Thereafter, defendant served a notice of intention to arbitrate which merely referred to "a controversy arising out of an equipment lease contract" and specified the date of the contract.²¹⁴ Plaintiff contended that this notice was defective in that it failed to state the specific nature of the dispute.²¹⁵ The Supreme Court, Monroe County, agreed with the plaintiff and enjoined the defendant from proceeding with arbitration, with leave to serve a new notice properly describing the controversy to be arbitrated.²¹⁶

Whether a dispute is covered by an arbitration agreement is an issue determinable by a court.²¹⁷ "[A] court must always inquire, when a party wants to invoke its aid to force a reluctant party to the arbitration table, whether the parties have agreed to arbitrate the particular dispute."²¹⁸ Clearly, specification of the dispute is essential to determination of whether it is arbitrable. No person should be compelled to arbitrate a particular issue unless he has contractually agreed that it was to be arbitrable.

CPLR 7511(b)(1)(iii): Letter agreement on submissions held not to limit the scope of a general arbitration clause, thereby permitting an award for consequential damages.

CPLR 7511 enumerates the various grounds upon which an arbitration award may be vacated. The broadest ground is a claim under CPLR 7511(b)(1)(iii) that the arbitrator has exceeded his power.²¹⁹ Decisional law has interpreted this basis for vacatur to mean that an arbitrator exceeds his power "only if [he gives] a completely irrational construction of the provisions in dispute and in effect [makes] a new contract for the parties."²²⁰ The scope of the arbitrator's power has
