
St. John's Law Review
courts are discerning jurisdictional prerequisites with remarkable facility.

The Survey sets forth in each installment those cases which are deemed to make the most significant contribution to New York's procedural law. Due to limitations of space, however, many other less important, but, nevertheless, significant cases cannot be included. While few cases are exhaustively discussed, it is hoped that the Survey accomplishes its basic purpose, viz., to key the practitioner to significant developments in the procedural law of New York.

The Table of Contents is designed to direct the reader to those specific areas of procedural law which may be of importance to him. The various sections of the CPLR which are specifically treated in the cases are listed under their respective titles.

ARTICLE 3 — JURISDICTION AND SERVICE, APPEARANCE AND CHOICE OF COURT

CPLR 302(a)(1) authorizes the assumption of in personam jurisdiction over any nondomiciliary who, in person or through an agent, "transacts any business" in New York. Inasmuch as the legislature elected not to establish precise guidelines when enacting this subsection, the determination of whether a defendant has transacted business in the state must be made according to the circumstances of each case. Alan Howard, Inc. v. American Acceptance Corp. is yet another illustration of the novel factual situations which have arisen under this proviso.

Defendant, a Delaware corporation which neither maintained an office nor conducted business in New York, had advanced money to Hale's Bedding Stores of New York, Inc. (Hale's) and received in return a security interest in the latter's inventory, accounts receivable and contract rights within the state. This agreement was perfected by filing a financing statement with the Secretary of State and the appropriate county clerk. Subsequently, Hale's assets were liquidated and applied in partial satisfaction of defendant's loan. Plaintiff, a judgment creditor of Hale's, sued to recover that portion of the proceeds which resulted from the surrender by Hale of a lease to property situated in New York. Allegedly, the appropriation by defendant of this money was effected with knowledge of Hale's insolvency and was not authorized by the security agreement. The lower court dismissed the action for lack of jurisdiction. The Appellate Division, First Department reversed, holding that the perfection of the security interest in New York and the partial liquidation of Hale's assets by defendant constituted purposeful transactions under the long-arm statute.

CPLR 302(a)(3) was recommended by the Judicial Conference and promptly enacted by the Legislature in response to the Court of Appeals decision in Feathers v. McLucas. There, the Court dismissed, for want of jurisdiction, an action in tort against a foreign corporation selling steel products on a national scale and presumably realizing that a defective product could be brought into New York. CPLR 302(a)(3) (ii) therefore provides personal jurisdiction over any nondomiciliary who, in person or by an agent, commits a tort (except defamation) outside New York causing injury therein, if he "expects or should reasonably expect the act to have consequences in the state and derives substantial revenue from interstate or international commerce." New Yorkers thereby received greater protection, while the restrictions included in this subsection equipped the courts with latitude sufficient to safeguard the rights of nonresident defendants and to insure justice in the particular circumstances of each case.

Theoretically, both elements of CPLR 302(a)(3)(ii) must be satis-
