In the principal case, the statute was construed to grant the privilege to public judicial proceedings, since any other construction would defeat the public policy behind the statute. The privilege is thereby denied whenever the proceedings have been made private by court rules sealing the record.

Although the decision is sufficiently broad to encompass other sealed matter,\(^\text{17}\) nevertheless, it may be limited to the specific type of matter here involved, that is, filed pleadings in matrimonial actions. The rule, as a practical matter, should not be extended to cover sealed testimony. The latter conclusion is supported by the distinct legal histories\(^\text{18}\) public policies and practical considerations attending testimony and filed pleadings.

Viewed practically, the decision would curtail undesirable newspaper sensationalism, which in turn would implement the protection of public morals, especially of young and impressionable adolescents. A further result of this case will be the protection of the reputation of those so often falsely accused as correspondents in matrimonial actions.

Torts — Municipal Liability for Illegal Acts of Third Parties.—Plaintiff sued on a negligence theory to recover damages for injuries caused by fireworks illegally discharged\(^\text{1}\) by invitees in defendant-municipality's park. Defendant's employees had previously seen, but had not stopped, similar fireworks. Although an admission fee was normally charged, none was required at the time of the injury, nor were the above-mentioned employees present. The... trial court's decision for plaintiff was reversed on the law by the Appellate Division. The Court of Appeals reversed, and held: A municipality is liable for injuries sustained as a result of patently dangerous and criminal acts of third parties within a public park if it has actual or constructive notice of these acts and their probable continuance. Caldwell v. Village of Island Park, 304 N. Y. 268, 107 N. E. 2d 441 (1952).

In the maintenance and supervision of public parks, a city performs a corporate or quasi-private function. Where an admission fee is charged, there is no doubt that the operation of the park is a private and profit-making enterprise, and liability will be imposed for negligent acts of the city. It would appear, however, from dicta in the case of Whittaker v. Franklinville, that where the negligent act is one of omission and no entrance fee is charged at any time, the governmental immunity rule would apply and protect the city from liability.

The city is not an insurer of the safety of those who use its parks, but a duty devolves upon it to exercise ordinary care. In this respect, it is liable in the same degree and on the same basis as individuals or private corporations. Liability is readily imposed for injuries resulting from defective equipment or facilities, or from failure adequately to protect against unsafe conditions existing in the park and likely to be a menace to human safety.

However, when the injuries suffered result from the acts of third persons invited into the park, it is more difficult to decide whether or not the city is liable. Because of the great difficulty in anticipating the actions of park visitors, liability will not be imposed upon a municipality unless it could have foreseen the dangerous act and consequently provided against it.\textsuperscript{11} Likewise, the city will be absolved if it does not have actual or constructive notice in time to prevent harm.\textsuperscript{12}

In \textit{Greiner v. Syracuse},\textsuperscript{13} the city was released from liability for injury resulting from an unlawful explosion in a public street. Two hours notice to policemen was held insufficient notice to the city. Since this occurrence was not an habitual and continuous invasion of the public right, but merely an "isolated trespass," the city could not be held to have received actual or constructive notice.

In a subsequent New York case, \textit{Fritz v. Buffalo},\textsuperscript{14} plaintiff recovered for injuries received as a result of boisterous activities of third parties on the ice-skating facilities of a public park. The question of notice was not discussed. The only question submitted to the jury was whether the injury resulted from inadequate supervision. Apparently, however, the city had foreseen that such rough and dangerous activities might take place, for it had acted by employing guards to watch for and prevent just such activities. It is probable that had the city provided adequate supervision, it would have been relieved from liability if an injury occurred.\textsuperscript{15}

In the present case, the dangerous activities engaged in at the beach park, cannot be classed as "habitual or continuous invasions of the public right" under the rule in \textit{Greiner v. Syracuse}, supra, inasmuch as they occurred on but \textit{two} consecutive days before the injury. Nor is it probable that the city foresaw these actions, as it had in the \textit{Fritz} case, for it took no precautions against them. It therefore seems to follow that the present case represents a lessening of the notice requirement and an increased burden of foreseeability upon the city.

In the majority of jurisdictions, the municipality would have escaped liability on the theory of governmental immunity.\textsuperscript{16} In the present case, however, the Court of Appeals accepts as well-established the principle that whether or not the park is operated for a profit, the city is acting in a quasi-private or corporate capacity. This seems to limit the force of the dictum in the Whittaker case, since liability was imposed despite the fact that no entrance fees were charged at the time the injury occurred.

It appears from this opinion that the court broadened the scope of municipal liability to what is perhaps an unreasonable degree. This decision follows a noticeable, though unfortunate, trend toward an extension of municipal tort liability—unfortunate, since it may result in discouraging small and impecunious municipalities from providing recreational facilities. With the tendency toward a decrease in governmental immunity, the ultimate burden upon the taxpayers will be increased, since they will pay not only for the supervision of parks, but also for injuries resulting from a lack of it.

Torts—Res Ipsa Loquitur—Exploding Beverage Bottle.—Plaintiff was injured when a beer bottle, which she had selected from a shelf in defendant’s self-service store, exploded in her hands. In an action to recover damages, plaintiff alleged breach of warranty and negligence. The Appellate Division, reversing a dismissal of the complaint, held that an inference of negligence arises when a customer is injured by the unexpected dangerous behavior of an article which was hitherto in the exclusive possession of a store owner. Day v. Grand Union Co., 280 App. Div. 253, 113 N. Y. S. 2d 436 (3d Dep’t 1952).

Actions for damages for injuries caused by exploding bottles are generally based either on breach of implied warranty or on negligence. The implied warranties—merchantability and fitness for use—arise only after there has been a contract of sale or transfer of title, and may be enforced only by those in privity of contract.
