Pleading--Parties--Partial Assignments--Workmen's Compensation (Doleman v. Levine, 295 U.S. 221 (1935))

St. John's Law Review

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarship.law.stjohns.edu/lawreview

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://scholarship.law.stjohns.edu/lawreview/vol10/iss2/24

This Recent Development in New York Law is brought to you for free and open access by the Journals at St. John's Law Scholarship Repository. It has been accepted for inclusion in St. John's Law Review by an authorized editor of St. John's Law Scholarship Repository. For more information, please contact lasalar@stjohns.edu.
It is said to be a well established principle of the common law that for injury to the child by a parent no action will lie. There were no cases of such action prior to 1891 in either the English or American reports, although there were many cases of criminal proceeding against parents by minor children which might have been brought civilly if such right of action existed. But the theory that there never was an action at common law has been denied. Maintenance of these actions, it was argued, would tend to destroy the peace of society and the tranquility of the home. A sound public policy designed to subserve the peace of the family and the best interests of society should, therefore, forbid the maintenance of such actions.

It is also argued, that as long as the relationship exists with its reciprocal rights and obligations, the child should not be allowed "to bite the hand that feeds it." While it has been the generally accepted principle to deny such right of action to the child, it seems that denying the right in certain cases defeats the purpose of the law. However, the rule denying the right of action is established in this state.

G. H. M.
Compensation Act of the District of Columbia, the wife alone elected to take compensation from the employer, and the employer as a statutory subrogee to her rights started a separate action against the defendant. The father, as administrator, then brought the present action for damages under the Wrongful Death Act. Defendant's plea in abatement which set up the pendency of the suit brought by the employer was sustained by the Supreme Court of the district. On appeal, held, reversed. The employer as an assignee of a partial chose in action could not bring an action in his own name. His remedy was in equity by proper joinder of parties, to compel the administrator to bring suit and distribute any proceeds. Doleman v. Levine, 295 U. S. 221, 55 Sup. Ct. 741 (1935).

The rule at common law forbade the partial assignee of a chose in action to sue at law in his own name, in order thereby to prevent splitting of the claim against the defendant and a multiplicity of suits in court. But he could sue in equity where the court had jurisdiction to bring in all parties in interest and try the single cause. This common law difficulty of joinder of parties was removed by the code in New York so that now each assignee of part of a claim has a cause of action at law where all proper parties may be joined, on defendant's motion to amend the complaint. Since the rule forbidding splitting of a claim operates to the defendant's advantage, his failure to move for proper joinder before trial will be deemed a waiver of the defect. A non-joinder of parties,

---

2 Code of Laws for Dist. of Columbia, tit. 21, §§ 1-3 (1929); cf. N. Y. Dec. Est. Law (1921) § 130.
however, is not a jurisdictional defect but may be remedied, and the complaint cannot be dismissed as not stating a cause of action.9

In the instant case, the employer as an indemnitor could not avail himself of the equity of subrogation and sue in his own name because he did not discharge the entire obligation10 and as his right to subrogation here was statutory, he could not sue independently on his partial claim in the absence of authorization in the statute.11 The employer's remedy, as at common law, was in equity by proper joinder of parties to compel the administrator to bring suit and to distribute any proceeds. In New York the employer would have had to bring suit in the name of the administrator, but on the theory that the latter was the "real party in interest" and the statutory trustee of the entire group of beneficiaries.12 A New York case, Globe Indemnity Co. v. Atlantic Lighterage Corp.,13 construing the same statute14 as the one here, held that as between an employer and his insurer, both part claimants to a chose in action against a third party, only the employer could sue in his own name, being the legal owner of the cause of action and the statutory trustee for the beneficiaries.15 The opinion in the Globe case is entirely consistent with the decision in the instant case and expresses sound law.

I. J. B.

---

11 Mandeville v. Welch, 18 U. S. 277 (1820). Cf. General Acc. Fire & Assur. Corp. v. Zerbe Const. Co., 269 N. Y. 227, 233, 199 N. E. 89, 91 (1935) (A party who is not an assignee but who is equitably entitled to a portion of a recovery may be joined as a party plaintiff and may obtain a separate judgment. This would not be splitting the cause of action.).

15 The Federal Longshoremen's Act differs from the N. Y. Workmen's Compensation Act in that in the latter the award of compensation operates as an assignment to the insurer of the cause of action of the injured employee against a third party.